The Shipping Interest.

One of the most unwelcome features of the stagnation, which pervades almost every channel of commercial enterprise throughout the country, is the remarkable depression of the Shipping interest, -an interest, probably more closely connected with the progress and prosperity of the nation at large, than any other we could name. The supply of tonnage is greatly in excess of the demand, not only here, but at every other port in the United States. And, notwithstanding the high prices of nearly all materials sagacious business men, would inure to our benofit.

> The blockade of the Baltic during the past six or eight months, has put an end to the carrying trade of that region. It is very true Amercan vessels never enjoyed a very extensive commerce there, but then, inasmuch as British, German, Danish, Swedish, and other bottoms which found lucrative employment in Russian trade, prior to the blockade, have all been withdrawn since, and added to the surplus Shipping upon the market at large, it may reasonably be supposed that an influence has been exercised against the interest on this side of the Atlanic. How long the present depression is destined to last, it is difficult to conjecture-but much depends upon the turn of the war abroad If peace soon succeed, a revival must soon follow-if the war is to go on, all speculations to this end are likely to be premature .-At present, our business with California and Australia is very light, with no present probability of an early revival. We have here the key, we think, to one of the leading causes of the present hard times. Millions and millions of money are locked up in the ruinous inaction which paralyzes our mercantile marine-millions that yield just now an average of less than six per cent. There are so many other branches of trade dependent upon this important branch of domestic enterprise, that whenever it suffers a serious depression, that depression invariably reacts upon an infinitude of minor interests, and thus too often all suffer in common.
